In Today's Issue

- State of the Crypto Market. The cryptocurrency industry and markets have witnessed extreme turmoil so far in 2022, but the longer-term story and investor appeal of cryptocurrencies and blockchain technologies remains generally intact. So, we wanted to provide an update on the state of the crypto markets and identify quality, actionable investments that have relatively weathered the storm should clients be interested in this segment.
- The Bitcoin ETPs: Grayscale Bitcoin Trust (GBTC), Grayscale Ethereum Trust (ETHE). These two Exchange Traded Products track the price of Bitcoin and Ethereum, respectively. They have assets of approximately $15 billion and $5 billion, respectively. Right now, both ETPs are trading at substantial discounts to the price of Bitcoin and Ethereum, creating a potential arbitrage opportunity if the market returns to normal.
- The Bitcoin ETF: ProShares Bitcoin Strategy ETF (BITO). This first of its kind ETF tracks the front-month Bitcoin futures contract traded on the CME. Unlike GBTC or ETHE, it closely tracks the price of Bitcoin throughout the year (usually not deviating by more than 1%).
- Crypto Ecosystem ETF: Amplify Transformational Data Sharing ETF (BLOK). BLOK is an actively managed ETF that seeks to invest at least 80% of its asset in companies actively involved in the development and utilization of blockchain technologies. The fund debuted in 2018 and has swiftly grown to over $600 million in assets dedicated to 50+ holdings. It also trades well over 300,000 shares per day on average, making it one of the most liquid baskets of crypto stocks in the market.

State of the Crypto Market

The first half of 2022 has been an ugly period for just about every asset class. However, few asset classes have been hit harder than the carnage that's ripped through the cryptocurrency space.

Digital tokens such as Bitcoin, Ethereum, and Dogecoin have fallen more than 70% from their 52-week all-time highs as a massive repricing event takes place throughout this relatively embryonic industry. Many experts have dubbed this event a "crypto winter" and its effects are dampening risk appetites for digital assets, as well as the associated companies that are involved in trading, storing, and mining in this market.

Cryptocurrencies entered the year with high hopes of gaining a greater foothold in mainstream finance and everyday transactional exchanges. However, those dreams have been put on hold as many newcomers that were sucked into buying near the highs have experienced the pain of meaningful losses in a very short period. There is nothing quite like the sinking feeling of turning $10,000 into $3,000 in just eight or nine months.

Individual investors aren't the only ones feeling the pain of this cleansing. Headlines surrounding the shuttering of massively leveraged crypto hedge funds and under-capitalized online brokerage platforms are leading to further anxiety of industry-wide implosions.

The ripple effect of leverage and decentralized lending platforms has exacerbated bankruptcies for several exchanges such as Voyager Digital and Celsius, with many customers being unable to redeem their dwindling assets. Faith was also misplaced in digital tokens that were touted as "stable coins" (marketed like a money market fund), many of which found themselves unable to sustain a $1 net asset value with extreme daily volatility.

Furthermore, the SEC has decided to investigate Coinbase Global Inc (COIN) for potentially listing and trading digital assets the regulator alleges should have been registered as securities. That announcement caused the stock price of COIN to plummet and even prompted crypto advocate Cathie Wood to dump shares of this high-growth company from her ARK Funds.

We know many clients are going to be clamoring for answers with so much upheaval this year. Several will be asking how to trade the crypto assets they have left, in addition to pouncing on fresh opportunities at massively discounted prices. The adage about buying when there is blood in the streets would be an apt description of the market as it stands today.

Our goal with this issue is to provide a balanced view of the crypto markets and bring you up to speed on some of the latest developments globally. Additionally, we want to provide sound guidance for your clients on how to navigate these inauspicious times with a level head to survive and ultimately thrive over the long term.

Assessing the Crypto Landscape and Investment Thesis

Crypto investors have historically pointed to the decentralized and unregulated nature of this alternative asset as one of its benefits compared to conventional financial instruments. The fact that there is no central point of registration, regulation, custodian, or exchange is an appealing libertarian-ish dynamic that has driven large swaths of retail speculation in this space.

However, that same lack of regulation means that there are over 20,000 crypto tokens currently in circulation along with more than 500 exchanges processing transactions 24 hours a day, seven days a week. The combined value of all this activity, otherwise known as total market cap, is one of the ways that crypto investors gauge interest and overall performance of this segment.

That collective market cap has fallen from a high of $3 trillion in late 2021 to a 52-week low of $900 billion through mid-2022.

What's driving this downfall? The answer is many of the same factors that have plagued other risk assets this year. A combination of macroeconomic elements that includes sharply rising inflation, fluctuating central bank policies, and global growth stagnation.

Cryptocurrencies have long been touted as an uncorrelated asset class versus conventional stocks or bonds. However, this year they have been broadly trading in a closely correlated fashion to other growth sectors of the stock market.

At one point Bitcoin made up roughly 95% of all cryptocurrency assets but has slowly lost ground to diversification across other tokens. Today, Bitcoin's market cap represents 42% of the shared marketplace with Ethereum gaining ground at 18%. Together these two assets are the dominant players throughout the market, and they are where an overwhelming amount of industry-wide trading takes place.

What's interesting is that on a standalone basis a trillion-dollar market cap seems like a massive pool of money. Yet when compared to the $250 trillion combined value of global public equity and fixed-income markets at the end of 2021, it's barely a blip on the map (source).

Not to mention the untold trillions in wealth allocated to the private equity, real estate, and credit markets that represent another massive store of accumulated financial assets.

Therein lies one of the more persuasive long-term investment theses for crypto investors. The relatively small fraction of money that is allocated to this sector today in relation to total global financial resources. In a recent guest appearance on a popular podcast, famed billionaire and "Shark Tank" investor Kevin O'Leary opined that:

"My investment thesis around crypto is that it's going to be one day regulated and that's when the real money is going to come into it. For all the excitement around Bitcoin, its total market cap is a rounding error when compared against sovereign wealth and pension funds. They aren't allowed to buy Bitcoin because it's not a regulated asset."

Thinking in terms of just one or two percent of the trillions of dollars in assets these massive wealth funds control could be a big boost. Those resources flowing into the crypto space would represent a collective explosion in price, volume, and overall market stability. While that result isn't guaranteed, there is gathering momentum for regulation of these alternative digital assets with unique diversification qualities. That turning point would provide the confidence and predictability that professional investors are looking for.

So, where does crypto stand today as a viable investment vehicle, store of value, or currency?

The answer is that its story hasn't meaningfully changed even through the rise and subsequent fall in the marketplace. It's not intended at this stage to be a true store of value or currency in the same way as precious metals or the U.S. dollar. Public perception is that those means of exchange are far more globally accepted and stable through hundreds of years of historical trade.

We have always emphasized this unique asset class as speculative with risk qualities on the highest end of the investment scale. However, that doesn't mean it doesn't offer an intriguing growth story even during one of its darkest periods. Its best-use case is still as an investment vehicle with capital appreciation potential—particularly for those with aggressive risk targets or long-term time horizons. Investors who own cryptocurrency assets or companies associated with the industry must be prepared for heightened volatility.

Setting those expectations in advance is one of the most important aspects of sizing, trading, and ultimately creating a successful plan around crypto investing. In the following sections, we explore an updated roadmap of available investment vehicles and their associated fundamentals.

Investment Sector Update: ETPs

One of the gateways to widespread investment adoption of cryptocurrencies such as Bitcoin and Ethereum is the ability for investors to own them in their traditional brokerage accounts. People want to be able to allocate to these digital assets in size without having to worry about opening new accounts, learning new systems, storing them securely, and exchanging them in the future. It's the exact same operational advantage of owning an exchange-traded fund such as GLD versus going out and purchasing a physical bar of gold.

That's the thesis behind the Grayscale Bitcoin Trust (GBTC) and Grayscale Ethereum Trust (ETHE). As you may remember, these exchange-traded vehicles don't function like a normal ETF because they don't create and redeem shares daily based on investor activity. They are structurally similar to a closed-end fund with a fixed number of shares and a market price that can trade at a premium or discount to the net asset value of the fund.

The SEC has not yet approved the creation of a true cryptocurrency ETF that can own the actual tokens. GBTC and ETHE are essentially the loophole for that regulatory hurdle and have been functioning successfully for over nine years.

As their titles suggest, these single-asset vehicles invest directly in Bitcoin and Ethereum tokens on behalf of the assets in the fund. Currently, GBTC has $15.2 billion under management while ETHE has $5.3 billion in assets. The tokens are stored securely offline in "cold storage" fashion and audited by independent recordkeepers as part of the custodian process.

The disadvantage of owning a closed-end trust is that it won't perfectly track the price movement of the underlying assets on a daily basis. That's a known risk that every investor must understand before diving into any of these funds. The contra argument is that you own shares in a fund with true exposure to the real tokens. It's not backed by futures contracts, paper swaps, or other financial wizardry.

So, how has the crypto winter treated these funds? About as well as can be expected given the extreme conditions. The selling in Bitcoin has expanded the discount on GBTC from a reasonable -11% in November 2021 to an outsized spread of -33% at today's prices.

Historically, the fund has traded at a premium or modest discount during normal market activity. The extreme discount of market price to NAV hasn't been this wide since its early adoption years in 2013-2014.

That's an attractive arbitrage opportunity for traders that are bullish on a turnaround in cryptocurrencies and believe that a new uptrend would meaningfully collapse the discount. You would get the tandem benefits of 1) The capital appreciation in the underlying assets, plus 2) The additional tailwind of trader sentiment driving the market price closer in line to the NAV.

Take a look at the chart here of the year-to-date price change in GBTC versus the spot price of Bitcoin/USD. While not perfectly overlapping, the directionality and price patterns are substantially similar enough to provide a high degree of confidence the fund is achieving its intended purpose.

Those investors that desire a more efficient tracking system may want to turn to a true ETF that debuted near the peak in crypto enthusiasm last year. The ProShares Bitcoin Strategy ETF (BITO) is a first of its kind ETF to track Bitcoin futures contracts through a liquid investment vehicle. BITO solves some of the inherent deficiencies of a publicly traded trust such as GBTC, while also introducing different risk dynamics.

The ProShares Bitcoin Strategy ETF owns front-month Bitcoin futures contracts that trade on the CME Group exchange. The benefit of using futures is the active managers that administer BITO have a deep pool of liquidity from which to ensure proper daily tracking of the NAV and market price for investors. The bitcoin futures market often trades more daily volume than the actual spot price of Bitcoin itself. That's a benefit in ensuring tight bid/ask spreads and execution for those trading larger quantities.

Detractors of BITO will point out that the fund doesn't track the spot price of Bitcoin in the same way that an ETF such as GLD tracks the gold market. Owning a futures contract allows an investor to buy or sell an asset at a predetermined price on a predetermined date. That means the market price of BITO (which shareholders own) is liable to experience periods where it tracks Bitcoin quite well and other periods where it falls short of this objective.

Fortunately, even during a period of extreme volatility, this fund has proven to be an adept performer at its stated objective. BITO has tracked the spot price of Bitcoin to within a narrow percentage point through the majority of 2022's sharp decline.

That consistent trading pattern bodes well for a relatively new strategy that has seen net inflows of more than $226 million this year. Investors are clearly betting on the long-term turnaround in this space and are confident that this ETF will participate in that appreciation efficiently.

While there is not yet a perfect ETF solution to the cryptocurrency investment thesis, these vehicles are proving adept at both retaining assets and overcoming a difficult trading environment. That alone should give wary investors confidence that these funds are going to be around for the long-term and pave the way for additional solutions to launch in the future.

Bottom line: Utilizing a fund such as BITO or GBTC allows your clients to have direct access to tracking the price of Bitcoin in their brokerage accounts. Both solutions are trading at multi-year lows, although there is always the risk that further disruption in this space causes further selling. Position sizes should be established with client risk tolerances and time horizons as defining factors.

Investment Sector Update: Crypto Ecosystem Stocks

Another way for investors to gain exposure to the crypto investment theme is through the companies that directly or indirectly support this sector. That includes leading names in semiconductors, financial services, capital markets, software, e-commerce, and more.

The benefit to this strategy is that you get a more diversified allocation to publicly traded and regulated entities trading on U.S. and foreign exchanges. Some clients may be more inclined to participate in the crypto theme in this manner rather than owning direct exposure to the digital tokens themselves.

What's become apparent after a deep dive through the related companies in this industry is that the characteristics of these stocks vary widely. Especially through the valley of harsh economic conditions many of these crypto and blockchain companies are now facing. You have everything from niche small-cap growth names that have yet to turn a profit, to mega-cap technology conglomerates that are on the highest end of the financial quality scale.

It's truly a bifurcated market that's difficult to identify where the perfect mix of risk versus reward lies by picking individual stocks. It would be disastrous to get the theme right if a resurgence in crypto momentum takes off, only to realize that the companies you chose weren't the right fit for the associated market tailwinds.

A more sensible option from a portfolio management standpoint is to participate via a diversified ETF with exposure to a wide array of sector holdings.

There are now close to 15 funds that track bitcoin adjacent, crypto, or next-generation internet stocks affiliated with this industry. The majority of these we can't recommend due to their minimal assets and short trading history. They just aren't suitable for advisors to utilize effectively or trade in size. These factors are particularly important during heightened periods of uncertainty such as what we are experiencing right now. And despite numerous index providers and ETFs trying to launch unique products, we keep returning to an industry trailblazer that offers a broadly compelling mix of underlying holdings.

The Amplify Transformational Data Sharing ETF (BLOK) is an actively managed exchange-traded fund that seeks to invest at least 80% of its asset in companies actively involved in the development and utilization of blockchain technologies. The fund debuted in 2018 and has swiftly grown to over $600 million in assets dedicated to 50+ holdings. It also trades well over 300,000 shares per day on average, making it one of the most liquid baskets of crypto stocks in the market.

BLOK contains pure-play stocks such as Coinbase Global Inc (COIN) and Marathon Digital Holdings (MARA) in addition to financial services stocks such as PayPal Holdings, Inc. (PYPL) and Block, Inc. (SQ). It also contains peripheral exposure to hardware stocks such as International Business Machines (IBM), Advanced Micro Devices (AMD), and NVIDIA Corp. (NVDA). One of the attractive qualities of this fund is that its portfolio is spread uniformly over large-, mid-, and small-cap companies. That way you get a broad cross section of the entire crypto ecosystem with approximately 75% of the holdings domiciled in North America and the remaining 25% located overseas.

Not surprisingly, this conventional ETF has fallen significantly from its 2021 all-time highs along with the broad-based declines throughout the crypto markets. The fund is down 42.4% on a year-to-date basis as it attempts to rebound from a 52-week low established in June. Aggressive investors looking for dislocations in the market may be attracted to this type of fund as a high-growth vehicle to utilize when momentum begins to turn.

BLOK is really a bet on the transformational nature of the blockchain rather than the direct price pattern of Bitcoin itself. It's going to provide access to companies that are first movers in this space and want to dominate exchange transactions, technology, or other structural components of the marketplace.

Bottom line: The type of investor that's going to have the most success with this fund is going to identify with the long-term growth potential of cryptocurrencies and wants to participate in the concomitant benefits. Of all the crypto-related funds we have screened, BLOK strikes a well-balanced mix of strategic and fundamental holdings that advisors can use in real-world portfolio strategies.

Conclusion

The crypto markets in 2022 have proven they aren't for the faint of heart, and even a sharp reversal from these levels will likely be fraught with additional volatility. Clients who choose to participate in this sector must be prepared to ignore short-term price fluctuations in pursuit of a more fundamental growth narrative.

There is still no meaningful evidence that these assets will ultimately replace conventional currencies or precious metals as wealth benchmarks. However, they do offer intriguing value for those that believe in the next generation of internet technology. They may ultimately just remain an unconventional asset class with unique investment characteristics and provide alternative diversification properties that many clients will appreciate.

Best,

Tom

Anti-Trade War QABA (First Trust Nasdaq ABA Community Bank Index Fund)	QABA is a play to protect against trade war ramifications (97% of its sales are U.S.-sourced). Additionally, it should also be a beneficiary of U.S. tax reform, in that, smaller U.S. companies should capture most of the 35% to 21% corporate tax cut. Two Playbooks for 2021	As our focus now turns from 2020 and towards 2021, I believe we always must be prepared for two outcomes – the expected, and the unexpected.  So, in this Alpha issue, we wanted to provide two ETF playbooks: The expected “Return to Normal” trade, and the Contrarian Scenario.  Playbook 1. What’s Expected: The “Return To Normal” Trade. The perfect storm being high economic confidence, vaccines rolling out to vulnerable groups, low-interest rates, and further government stimulus in the first quarter. That paints the perfect picture for capitalizing on beaten-down areas of the economy that are ripe for further expansion.  Playbook 2: The Unexpected: A Contrarian Scenario. A scenario where things just don’t work as planned. That's because a stagflationary environment is a very difficult one to successfully invest in as, broadly speaking, it's negative for most stocks, most bonds, and idle cash (purchasing power is eroded through inflation).  Positively, stagflation is not the most likely macro-economic scenario going forward (a stock positive reflation scenario is the most likely future macro set-up). We have produced this annual Contrarian Issue for the last several years to serve two primary functions. First, I'm a contrarian investor at heart, and I always enjoy scouring what "didn't" work during an investment year to determine whether these relatively cheap sectors or factors present an attractive opportunity, as contrarian investing can lead to outperformance. Second, we like to provide these contrarian ideas so that if a client asks you "What's cheap right now?" or "Are there any opportunities from last year?" you have interesting, well-founded ideas that can impress clients and prospects.	12/28/2021	KWEB: -25.96% CXSE: -22.88% GDX: -12.58% SIL: -26.24% XLU: 4.97% SPLV: -5.69%	SPY: -13.31%

This Alpha issue is an important complement to what we've been discussing in the regular Sevens Report, namely that we believe the best way to weather this increased volatility in markets is by allocating to "Quality" stocks, sectors, and ETFs.  For us, "quality" means those stocks and ETFs with lower relative price-to-earnings (P/E) and price-to-book (P/B) ratios, strong free cash flow, and solid shareholder yield. We believe these stocks and sectors will be the most insulated from the effects of interest rate hikes, possibly slowing growth and other headwinds, and find themselves as high-quality landing spots for investment capital.	1/25/2022	FXO: -6.30% QVAL: -3.34% SYLD: -4.77% RPV: -3.60%	SPY: -4.14%
